Since the vote to leave the EU, commentary on the division of the country has dominated our national conversation. But attempts to explain the result have oversimplified some factors and obscured others. Progressives must challenge these narratives and offer our own stories about what happened and what should come next. This issue looks to both understand division in the UK and to begin the healing process. And, it begins to imagine what, at the end of that process, a more progressive country really looks like.

Featuring:

- Lisa McKenzie on the portrayal of the working class in the Brexit debate
- Kojo Koram on national symbols and identity
- Naomi Klein and Ed Miliband on the unifying potential of a Green New Deal
- Roslyn Fuller on the case for a more populist democracy and Leanne Wood on the need for decentralisation of power.
EDITORIAL TEAM

Editor: Carys Roberts
Assistant editors: Joshua Emden \ Shreya Nanda \ Chris Thomas
Production editors: Abi Hynes \ Richard Maclean
Cover illustration: Harry Tennant \ Central Illustration

SUBMISSIONS

IPPR Progressive Review welcomes papers that seek to contribute to our goal of rethinking progressive politics, in Britain and internationally. To submit a paper for consideration, please email Carys Roberts (c.roberts@ippr.org), or post to IPPR, 14 Buckingham Street, London WC2N 6DF. Posted submissions will not be returned.

www.IPPR.org/progressivereview

Follow us on Twitter: @IPPR
Since the vote to leave the EU, commentary on the division of the country has dominated our national conversation. But attempts to explain the result have oversimplified some factors and obscured others. Progressives must challenge these narratives and offer our own stories about what happened and what should come next. This issue looks to both understand division in the UK and to begin the healing process. And, it begins to imagine what, at the end of that process, a more progressive country really looks like.

Featuring:

Lisa McKenzie on the portrayal of the working class in the Brexit debate

Kojo Koram on national symbols and identity

Naomi Klein and Ed Miliband on the unifying potential of a Green New Deal

Roslyn Fuller on the case for a more populist democracy and Leanne Wood on the need for decentralisation of power.

The permafrost of no alternatives has cracked; the horizon of political possibilities is expanding. IPPR Progressive Review is a pluralistic space to debate where next for progressives, examine the opportunities and challenges confronting us and ask the big questions facing our politics: transforming a failed economic model, renewing a frayed social contract, building a new relationship with Europe. Publishing the best writing in economics, politics and culture, IPPR Progressive Review explores how we can best build a more equal, humane and prosperous society.

www.IPPR.org/progressivereview
The Institute for Public Policy Research
Contents

Editorial
Chris Thomas, Shreya Nanda, Joshua Emden and Carys Roberts
224

The British class system is in great shape
Lisa Mckenzie
230

Bridging the Brexit divide
Lisa Nandy
238

Whose flag?
Kojo Koram
243

‘Beyond barbarism’
Leanne Wood
250

Aufstehen, Hinsetzen
Adrian Kreutz
255

Beyond the ‘populist’ label
Roslyn Fuller
263

Visions of the future
Ed Miliband and Naomi Klein
271

Imitation, resentment and the rise of populism
Ivan Krastev and Carys Roberts
277