

Ways to get Impact for your article

- 1. Present your working paper as much as you can! Getting your work out to the community will help boost your future citations and collaborations.
- 2. Post your working papers to your institutional repository, then update with a link to the final version on the journal website.
- 3. Link - Your article has its own URL and is available in thousands of institutions around the world. Instead of copying your abstract or sharing a PDF, provide a link to the published version. This will help readers find the definitive version, ensuring that your article's downloads and citations are maximised.
- 4. Spread the word - add your link to recommended reading lists, your website and email footer, contribute to online blogs, twitter, listservs and discussion forums (the more online links leading back to your paper, the higher up the Google rankings – Google search results – your paper will appear.) Here is our citation template text: Author, A., Author, B., Author, C. and Author, D. (Year), Title of the Paper. European Journal of Pain, Volume Number.: Pages x–y. doi: 10.1002/j.1532-2149.2013.xxxxx.x (see the “How to Cite” link like the one here from your paper's abstract page online).
- 5. Sign up to our Author Services site to nominate colleagues to receive free access to your article when it's published.
- 6. Bookmark & Share registering your article on reference manager sites will enable you to tap into academic social networks that help others discover both you and your research. Simply click on your preferred link from the menu next to your article on Wiley Online Library.
- 7. Collaborate with your institution to create a press release. In many cases Wiley Blackwell will make your article free for such an event.
