Household Finance and Health – Special Issue

Lead Editor – Vicki L. Bogan, Cornell University

The relationship between health and household finance is an area of growing interest not only because it contributes to our understanding of individual investment behavior but also because it illuminates another way in which health affects economic status. There is an ongoing debate in the economic and medical literature about the causes of the connection between income and health. If the determinants of the connection were better understood, financial planners and policymakers alike might be able to develop more target strategies to improve financial and personal well-being. This special issue will present the latest research in the area of household finance and health issues that encompasses the eight major content areas of Financial Planning Review and directly or indirectly relate to financial planning practice.

We currently invite the submission of research papers on topics at the intersection of household finance and health. Areas of interest include, but are not limited to:

- How factors related to physical and/or mental health influence household saving, portfolio behavior, borrowing decisions, and investment choices
- Theoretical models explaining household financial decisions that explicitly include health related factors
- Empirical research on household financial behaviors which could include analyzing the influence of various public and private policies on household financial choices

Paper submission deadline: December 31, 2020
